

I am strongly against any changes in rules that may allow a higher concentration of media ownership. The current amount of concentration has already greatly restricted the variety of viewpoints and access to more localized news. Currently, there is essentially one superfluous mass media, with few options, most being small, trivial and marginalized. The current state of media is in direct contrast with the concept of free speech, etc. If rules are changed, they should be changed to promote an increase in a variety of ownership, certainly not the reverse.
